

WASHINGTON, July 23 (Reuters) - A Republican lawmaker who has tried several times to marshal congressional support to speed approve of the Keystone XL crude oil pipeline is taking another crack at it with a new bill.

Lee Terry is slated to unveil his latest proposal on Monday afternoon, which would allow construction to begin on all but the portion of TransCanada Corp's pipeline that goes through his home state of Nebraska.

Click here to continue reading.